CHAPTER XII. Mr. Peaslee, we fear, will suppose we have forgotten him, in consequence of our tardiness in noticing his intrigues in relation to the late congressional nomination, which we hinted at in our last. But we presome be can easily excuse the delay.

There were several aspirants for the democratic nomination in this, the 5th district, previous to the last election. Among these mentioned, either by themselves or their friends, were Messrs. Wick, Palmer, Tannehill, Ritchey, Cook, Peaslee, and A. F. Morrison.

So far as we were concerned, we should have been well enough pleased with the nomination of l'almer. Tannehill, or Ritchey, as well as Wick. Dr. Cook we knew but little of previously; could have had no objection to him, and should have cheerfully supported him had he been the nominee.

Morr.son, of course, pushed himself out, as usual. Nobody but himself would have thought of his nomination. The scandalous course he had pursued two years previously-when Brown was nominated-alone would have prevented his nomination at the last May Convention. Morrison probably knew this very well; but he had another object in view; he was an applicant for the post office at Indianapolis, and he wanted two strings to his bow. He desired to produce effect thought it proper to change, then to vote for Peaslee: an estray has only to call on his county clerk; and if at Washington, and to have an opportunity to bargain with his competitors for either office here.

Passing over his intrigues and attempted bargains with others, for the present, we confine ourselves to Peaselee, with whom Morrison compromised, and in whose favor he finally withdrew.

Peaselee acted more adroitly than Morrison-cunning and smart as the latter thinks homself. He had for some months been paving his way among that class of men who endeavor to regulate all sorts of political affairs among the lawyers as they travel round the circuit. Consequently, in several of the counties, he had persons legging for him-a very legation until otherwise directed. common arrangement among fourth-rate politicians, who "help one another" in that way.

Such also appeared to be the feeling of a majority of the delegates from the same township. But such did not appear to be the opinion or desire of Mr. Peaselee. He waited upon two or more of the five delegates of the township, - (one being from the first his fast friend.) -and orged his claims upon them and the party, personally. His appeals to the junior editor of this paper, beginning by wheedling and bly be sent in, it is likely we shall celebrate the day ready to condemn it, and for the simple reason that ending by covert threats, the latter answered by in style, and improve much faster than on corn bread they could not control its columns." plainly telling him that the only rule of action he and potatoes, and have something to give thanks for. could recognize as proper was to carry out in good faith, as far as possible, the wishes of a majority of the constituency represented.
